

Nurses talk truth.

Public health care is on the line.

No one knows the true state of health care in Ontario the way nurses do. They deliver the majority of direct care to patients. It's nurses who deal every day with the disruptions in our precarious, under-resourced system. They're the ones who have to face the frustration that patients and their families express because of long wait times and staffing shortages. And it's nurses who are told to do more with less.

The days of nurses carrying the load and being disrespected are over. They're speaking out with an insider's perspective on the collapse of public health care.
